Introduction

Long Island's North Shore Gold Coast, more than any other section of the country, captured the imagination of twentieth-century America, even overshadowing the Island's South Shore and East End estate areas, which have remained relatively unknown. This, in part, is attributable to F. Scott Fitzgerald's The Great Gatsby, which continues to fascinate the public in its portrayal of the life-style, as Fitzgerald perceived it, of the North Shore elite of the 1920s.¹

The North Shore estate era began in the latter part of the 1800s, more than forty years after many of the nation's wealthy had established their country homes in the Towns of Babylon and Islip, along the Great South Bay Ocean on the South Shore of Long Island. It reached its peak in the 1920s just as the estate area of the South Shore was changing to a more suburban profile. This concentrated area of estate development extended eastward along the Island's North Shore into Nassau County from the Queens/Nassau County boundary of New York City for approximately twenty-five miles to the Village of Centerport in Suffolk County and some fifteen miles southward from the shoreline of Long Island Sound. Unlike the East End estates, in the area now known as The Hamptons, and those on the South Shore in the Towns of Babylon and Islip, the North Shore estates tended to be more elaborate, many designed in English, French, or Italian architectural styles of the seventeenth, eighteenth, and nineteenth centuries.

The South Shore estate owners built their homes conveniently close to the main roads and actually financed railroad spurs to serve the South Shore communities where their homes were located. By contrast, the exclusivity of the North Shore estate owners is legendary. In an attempt to protect their privacy, the North Shore barons used their considerable influence to see to it that public roads and railroads were in disrepair to keep "the city people" out. Private guards were employed, not only to protect the estates and their occupants, but also to discourage uninvited weekend picnickers from New York City. The largest of the North Shore estates encompassed six hundred to two thousand acres and employed between two hundred and fifty and, as many as, four hundred people.² Taking into account the "ripple effect," about 20,000 Long Islanders owed their employment to the estates. This, in an era when the total year-round population of Nassau County went from 55,448 in 1900 to 406,748 in 1940 and that of Suffolk went from 77,582 to 197,355 during the same time period.³

A few North Shore millionaires actually vied to see who could build the highest hill on which to locate their mansions. Railroad lines were laid to the estate sites during construction so that trainloads of dirt could be brought in to build up the mansion site. Clarence Mackay and Otto Kahn became noteworthy contestants in this effort.⁴

Yet, in spite of the extravagant expenditure to build, decorate, and furnish the new homes and landscape the often extensive acreage on which they had been located, virtually all of the estates, with few exceptions, were intended to be secondary country homes. Since in the late 1800s and early 1900s Long Island was considered unhealthy in the summer due to mosquitoes, summers were spent in such places as Newport, the Adirondacks, or Maine, while spring and autumn were spent on Long Island. In the winter, households returned to Manhattan and Brooklyn, or went to the Carolinas, or to Palm Springs.

The image portrayed of the North Shore estate area residents in The Great Gatsby is one of irresponsible, pleasure-seeking individuals who are indifferent to anyone or anything beyond their immediate circle of friends. While this stereotype may well have been true of some, it certainly was not true of the majority of the residents of the North Shore of Long Island during the Gold Coast Era. This is dramatically confirmed by the entries under civic activists, statesmen, diplomats, intelligence agents, and politicians in the occupation appendix of this book. When the occupation, maiden name, and village location appendices are analyzed, the immensity of the business and social networking becomes evident. True, the area was home to captains of industry, some of whom established their fortunes under questionable circumstances, but it was also home to many more millionaires and their scions who served their nation with distinction.

Theodore Roosevelt, the only United States president to have his primary home on Long Island, was a North Shore resident. Two of the seven first ladies (both domestic and foreign) to have Long Island connections resided on the North Shore. While there is some dispute as to what constitutes a summer White House, four presidents did vacation on Long Island. Three Central Intelligence Agency directors resided on Long Island; two of those three had homes in this area. Two unsuccessful candidates for the United States presidency, seven of the Island's eleven Secretaries of State, plus numerous other cabinet members, assistant cabinet members, diplomats, congressmen, intelligence agents, publishers, industrialists, inventors, capitalists, and financiers, called the North Shore of Long Island home.⁵

The decline of the North Shore estate era has traditionally been attributed to the dramatic increase in property tax, the advent of inheritance and income taxes, the lingering effects of the Depression, the construction of the Northern State Parkway, and the fact that fewer people were willing to enter estate service in the post-World War II period. In an attempt to negate the influence of these factors some estate owners employed various techniques to protect their fortunes and estates.

In 1911, Roswell Eldridge created the Village of Saddle Rock to protect his estate Udalls from excessive property taxes. By having the state law relevant to village incorporation changed from a population requirement of two hundred and fifty persons to a requirement of only fifty persons, the Village of Saddle Rock, with a total area of only 0.2 square miles, could then be incorporated, thereby giving Udalls the distinction of being the only estate in New York State to be solely incorporated as a village.⁶ George Fisher Baker II, Harvey Dow Gibson, John Edward Aldred, and William Dameron Guthrie followed Eldridge's example when in 1931 they combined their estates and formed their own incorporated Village of Lattingtown to control their property taxes. Several estate owners, including Marshall Field III, whose estate Caumsett was located in Lloyd Harbor, opted to demolish a portion of their mansions in order to reduce taxes. J. P. Morgan, Jr. and his son Junius repeatedly went to court to have property taxes reduced on their respective Glen Cove estates.⁷

Ferdinand Lundberg refutes the commonly held belief that inheritance taxes decimated the family fortunes of the wealthy. He illustrates how the Rockefellers were able to negate inheritance taxes, so that their effect was almost inconsequential, by the establishment of a series of trusts and the transfer of assets to their heirs prior to their deaths. According to Lundberg, assets transferred prior to 1914 were tax-free, taxes paid on the transfer of funds from 1924-1930 were calculated at low tax rates, and taxes paid in the 1930s were based on depression-low levels.⁸

In an attempt to preserve their wealth by blunting the effect of the federal income tax, North Shore estate owners William Dameron Guthrie (Lattingtown), Victor Morawetz (Woodbury), and Charles Steele (Old Westbury), of the Manhattan law firm Seward, Guthrie, Morawetz, and Steele, carried the fight against the federal income tax to the United States Supreme Court. In 1895, they succeeded in having the income tax declared unconstitutional. It would remain so until 1913, when it was legalized by the passage of the Sixteenth Amendment.⁹ After the establishment of the federal income tax laws, there was little that the North Shore barons could do to stem the tide of ever-increasing federal taxes, but they remained a force to be reckoned with on the national, state, and local levels. During the 1920s the GOP's National Finance Committee consisted of one representative from each of the forty-eight states and one from Long Island's Nassau County. This anomaly is not surprising if one considers that a large percentage of the Republican Party's major donors came from the Island's North Shore. The North Shore barons were also able to influence and, in most cases, control the state and county GOP by ensuring that their candidates were elected and obtained important legislative chairmanships.¹⁰

Unknowingly, in 1926 the North Shore estate owners sowed the seeds of their own destruction when they sent the twenty-six-year-old Frederick Trubee Davison to the New York State Legislature as an assemblyman to protect their interests. Surely they must have expected that Davison, the son of North Shore millionaire and J. P. Morgan partner Henry Pomeroy Davison, Sr., would be loyal to their interests. What they hadn't counted on was that this naive freshman assemblyman would put into the hands of Long Island State Park Commissioner Robert Moses the legislation that would permit Moses to become a different kind of baron, a baron who would contribute to the demise of North Shore estates. Indeed, in the opinion of one lawyer, sections eight, nine, and eighteen of the bill that Davison introduced and guided through passage enabled the Long Island Park Commission to take over all of Suffolk County (and, presumably, Nassau County) as long as the governor signed the appropriation form.¹¹

Robert Moses' threat to execute eminent domain to obtain the right-of-way for the construction of Northern State Parkway and the subsequent construction of the parkway through the estate area have been noted by many as blows to the estate class. Yet, on closer inspection, it is apparent that the extensive changes to the proposed path of the controversial parkway were due to the considerable political influence of the more powerful estate owners. Otto Kahn, whose estate Oheka was located in Cold Spring Harbor, became exceedingly distressed when he learned that Northern State Parkway was to intersect his estate. Although never known for his flexibility, Robert Moses decided to accommodate his cousin Kahn by moving the parkway six miles to the south, locating it just south of the estates in the West Hills section of Suffolk County. When the Old Westbury estate owners learned of the Moses-Kahn agreement, they too insisted upon accommodation. Their success in having the parkway diverted around their estates accounts for the sudden two-mile detour to the south taken by the Northern State Parkway at Glen Cove Road in Nassau County.¹²

North Shore estate owner Townsend Scudder II was not as successful in obtaining an accommodation on the parkway's route for the celebrated Meadow Brook Club from Robert Moses. As vice president of the New York State Park Commission and a charter member of the club, he accompanied Moses to a club meeting where they explained the proposed route for Northern State Parkway to the club's membership. To a man, the members denounced the parkway.¹³

Even the powerful Links Golf Club, which was organized in 1921 and located in the North Shore community of North Hills by members of Manhattan's prestigious Links Club, was threatened by the parkway. The club eventually relinquished a portion of its rough to Moses for the parkway right-of-way thereby preserving the golf course which existed undisturbed well into the 1970s, when it was sold for a housing development.¹⁴

With the exception of some minor victories, Moses' initial assault on the North Shore estates was unsuccessful. He was unable to implement his original plan to dissect the heart of the estate area with Northern State Parkway. Ultimately, but perhaps not as quickly as he anticipated, the parkway did contribute to the decline of the estate era by providing easier access to Manhattan which, in turn, encouraged the eventual suburbanization of Nassau County a generation later.

One factor that has been overlooked by most historians as an integral causative influence leading to the gradual and irreversible decline of the North Shore estates is the continual distribution, and subsequent diminution, of family fortunes and estate acreage among members of succeeding generations of heirs. Long Island sociologist Dennis P. Sobin, is one of the few Long Island authors who have considered the effects of family size and the divorce rate on the Island's North Shore estates. For statistics, Sobin relies on the research of Pitirim Sorokin which states that wealthy families averaged four and a half children, which was not significantly different from the size of the average American family as reported in the 1920 United States Census. Sorokin, however, concludes that there was a significant increase in the divorce rate of the wealthy. The rate was, in fact, double that of the general population.¹⁵ This comparatively high divorce rate, the effect of which was compounded with each succeeding generation, severely strained the fortunes of many estate owners.

Undoubtedly, the fortunes of many estate families and the size of their estate holdings were impacted by these socio-economic changes to varying degrees and it may well be true that the gradual decline was, in part, precipitated by such factors.

A careful analysis of estate ownership maps and property title records does not confirm the destructive socio-economic effects of the 1920s and 1930s on the North Shore estate area. A cursory consulting of maps and title records, which simply list the new names of the property owners and do not show a family relationship to previous owners, has led to the widely-held supposition that the wealthy class had been decimated by the events of the 1920s and early 1930s and that they were forced to dispose of their estates. This misconception may have been due, in part, to the fact that property titles usually showed male ownership and to the absence, until now, of a maiden name index devoted solely to North Shores estate families. Without a maiden name index, it has been difficult for historians to trace the continuity of a family's ownership when all, or a portion of, the estate was inherited by a married daughter. The index is equally important when estate ownership is delineated on the map by a wife's first name or initials. After a husband's death, a divorce settlement, or a wife's remarriage, concomitant name changes further complicate ascertainment of estate ownership. Under these circumstances, the index of maiden names can be especially useful in tracing ownership, as it is, also, in cases where a wife obtained ownership of estate property through her divorce settlement and has, as is sometimes the case, returned to the use of her maiden name.

The changes in American society through the 1940s, leading to the subsequent suburbanization of Nassau County with the threat of urbanization looming in the future, and the county's evolution from a retreat away from New York City to its persisting role as a bedroom community of the City, had an equal, if not greater, effect upon the estate class, causing many families to eventually relocate their country homes to other elitist sections of the country. However, contrary to popular belief, a comparison of the acreage listed in the surname entry section of this book proves that many descendants remained on portions of their family estates well beyond the 1940s. This is supported by research delineated in historical notations, included at the end of each surname entry.

All these factors notwithstanding, remnants of the North Shore estate era persist, although as a greatly diminished ghost of the style and elegance of the period when it was known as the Gold Coast. Many homes remain private residences, virtually unchanged from the pre-World War II period, but they are now situated on drastically reduced acreage. Gone are the days of the estates that encompassed hundreds of acres requiring the year-round service of large staffs of servants. Gone, also, is a unique era in American social history.

Otto Kahn also went to great extremes to build up the site on which his French Chateau Oheka was built in Suffolk County. Although the Kahn mansion was not on the highest natural elevation in Suffolk County, it did have the distinction of being the second largest mansion in the United States, the largest being the Vanderbilt mansion Biltmore, in Asheville, North Carolina. In addition to the Theodore Roosevelts, who resided at Sagamore Hill in Cove Neck and returned there to summer, President Chester A. Arthur summered at the home of New York City Police Commissioner Stephen French on Union Street, Sag Harbor; President Herbert Hoover summered at the estate of John Teele Pratt, Sr., Manor House, now Glen Cove Mansion Hotel and Conference Center, on Dosoris Lane, Glen Cove; and, in 1845, President John Tyler summered at the home of his widowed mother-in-law, Mrs. David Gardiner, on Main Street, East Hampton. Three Central Intelligence Agency directors resided on Long Island. Two of them resided in the North Shore estate area—William Casey at 10 Glenwood Road, Roslyn Harbor, and Allen Dulles on Lloyd Harbor Road, Lloyd Harbor. George John Tenet was born in Flushing, Queens, and raised in Little Neck, Queens, Long Island, just west of the North Shore estate area. John William Davis, who resided on Overlook Road, Lattingtown, was the unsuccessful Democratic candidate for President of the United States in 1924. Norman Mattoon Thomas of Cold Spring Harbor, who ran unsuccessfully five times as the Socialist candidate for the Presidency, resided on Goose Hill Road, Cold Spring Harbor. Nathan Lewis Miller of Upper Brookville, Theodore Roosevelt of Cove Neck, and William Averell Harriman of Sands Point and Old Westbury, served as New York State governors. For a listing of the seven Secretaries of State from the North Shore estate area see the statesmen and diplomats section of the appendix. Several non-North Shore Long Islanders also served as Secretary of State — Elihu Root, Sr. (Mayfair, Southampton), who served in the Theodore Roosevelt administration; Christian A. Herter (The Creeks, East Hampton), who served in the Eisenhower administration; Cyrus Vance (Flushing), who served in the Carter administration; and Colin Powell (Hollis), who served in the George W. Bush administration.

6. Eldridge served as the first and only mayor of Saddle Rock until his death in 1927 at which time he was succeeded by his wife Louise, who remained the village's mayor until her death in 1947. During this period the village had three streets, no crime, police station, or jail, and the village trustees doubled as the estate's employees. Over the years Saddle Rock's population of 71 in 1920; 1,109 in 1960; and 791 in 2000, has remained one of the smallest of the North Shore villages.

Each club had a separate board of governors; members of the Manhattan-based Links Club could use the golf club but those with membership only in the golf course could not use the New York City club facilities. (Harry W. Havemeyer, interview, December, 1999.) Moses' victory over the Links Golf Club was astonishing considering the powerful opponent he faced in the combined membership.

Ferdinand Lundberg evaluated this power in his statement concerning the Links Club's membership when he wrote, "Financially and corporately speaking, there is little or no deadwood in the Links' roster. If its membership does not exactly run the country it has much to say about its course. Here are what the Russian and Chinese press morosely refer to as "American ruling class." Historical notes:

The house, originally named Elmhurst, was built by Willard Dickerman Straight.

He was the son of Henry H. and Emma Dickerman Straight of Oswego, NY.

Dorothy Payne Whitney was the daughter of William Collins and Flora Payne Whitney, who resided in Old Westbury. Her brother Harry Payne Whitney also resided in Old Westbury. After the death of her husband, she married Leonard Knight Elmhirst.

*The original name of the Straight estate was Elmhurst. It was changed to Apple Green [Applegreen] after Dorothy Whitney Straight's marriage to Leonard Knight Elmhirst. [Jane Brown, Beatrix: The Gardening Life of Beatrix Jones Farrand 1872-1959 (New York: Viking Penguin Books, 1995), p. 213.]

Willard Dickerman and Dorothy Payne Whitney Straight's daughter Beatrice won the 1976 Academy Award for Best Supporting Actress for her role in the motion picture Network.

In the 1930s their son Michael Whitney Straight became a member of the Communist Party. After World War II, while he was serving as an unpaid volunteer in the State Department, he was approached by a Soviet agent to supply government documents. According to Straight, the only documents he gave to the Soviets were those he had written on Nazi Germany. He later identified Guy Burgess and Anthony Blunt as Communist spies in Great Britain resulting in the notorious British Burgess–Blunt–Long–Maclean–Philby spy scandal. Alfred Hopkins designed the farm complex (for Tiffany)

Landscape architect(s): Louis Comfort Tiffany designed landscaping which included two driveways (one from Moore's Hill Road with allee of maple trees and ground cover of daylilies; the other from Tiffany Road, one-mile-long through woods with waterfall and ground cover of daffodils), daffodil field, 100-yard-long arch of espaliered apple trees, formal sunken garden with marble fountain and bronze statue, The Boy (Elihu Vedder, 1900-02), terraces including daffodil terrace, four garden fountains, pergolas, ponds, gravel paths, and "hanging" garden; gardens were lit by rotating colored lights

House extant: no; demolished in 1957*

Historical notes:

The house, originally named Laurelton Hall, was built by Louis Comfort Tiffany.

The Long Island Society Register, 1929 lists Louis Comfort Tiffany as residing at Laurelton Hall in Laurelton [Laurel Hollow], while the Social Register New York, 1933 lists him as residing at Comfort Lodge, 1865 Brickell Avenue, Miami, FL.

*At Tiffany's death in 1933, a portion of the estate was donated to the Tiffany Foundation. This included the house and numerous outbuildings, where an art school was operated.

According to Hugh F. McKean, The "Lost" Treasures of Louis Comfort Tiffany, Tiffany designed Laurelton Hall. [Hugh F. McKean, The "Lost" Treasures of Louis Comfort Tiffany (Garden City: Doubleday & Co., Inc., 1980), p. 6.]

The Art Institute of Chicago has Vedder's cast for the statue of The Boy.

During World War II the estate became the headquarters for the Marine Research Organization and the Nation's Research Committee. [The North Shore Journal 3 (March 4, 1971).]

*Abandoned by the art foundation and in disrepair, the eighty-four-room house was destroyed by fire in 1957. Art works of Tiffany, which could be salvaged from the ruined house, were taken to Winter Park, Florida, where they now may be viewed in the Hosmer Morse Museum of American Art. Some of the outbuildings remain and have been converted into private homes. Also surviving is the Moorish-style smokestack from the powerhouse.

House extant: yes

Historical notes:

The twenty-four-room house, originally named Deepdale, was built by William Kissam Vanderbilt, Jr.

[See following entry for family information.]

In 1930 Dr. Louis F. Licht, Sr. purchased the house and remodeled it in 1931 by demolishing the two wings. [The New York Times July 11, 1930, p. 38.]

In 1949 the house was for sale by the Lichts. The asking price was $125,000 for eleven acres, a four-car garage with sleeping quarters, and the house, which had been downsized to nineteen and a half rooms with nine bedrooms, six bathrooms, two half bathrooms, and two servants' bedrooms.

The estate's golf course and clubhouse are owned by the Village of Lake Success. The estate's gatehouse is now the rectory of St. Phillips and St. James Episcopal Church. Some of Deepdale's garden statuary including the columns from ancient Carthage can be found on the grounds of Vanderbilt's Centerport estate, Eagle's Nest.

Architects

See the surname entry to ascertain if more than one architect was involved in designing the various buildings on an estate. This list reflects their North Shore commissions and includes the original and subsequent owners of the estates. When the owner who contracted with the architect is known, it is indicated by an asterisk. See village entry for cross referencing of names not found as separate surname entries.

Landscape Architects

When the date of landscaping is known, it has been included in brackets. Since, in some instances, more than one landscape architect worked on an estate and, in some rare instances, the architect who designed the house also designed the estate's grounds, the surname entry should be consulted to determine if anyone else was involved in designing the estate grounds. When the estate owner who contracted for landscaping is known, it is indicated by an asterisk. Original and subsequent estate owners are included in the list. See village entry for cross referencing of names not found as separate surname entries.
